King's Pardon

Bangkok Central Prison
August 1st / 1993

The King of Thailand has granted two English women Royal Pardons. These women were charged with possession of thirty kilos of heroin. (Quote- Thai News)

Their story is filled with intrigue, money, jet setting, heroin, imprisonment, murder and now freedom, having served only three years of their sentences.

I would like to know, if the drug laws in Thailand are going to change or will Royal Pardons be used as publicity ploys for governments?.

Governments which are the instruments of the people to uphold the laws of the land must surely realize that fairness and equality to all, is what is needed to keep the status-quo.

Will this example of good-will for the British women be made a Precedent?

Can we expect to see women and men incarcerated for the same offence already having served more than three years and charged with a lesser amount of heroin also be freed?

You can imagine the controversy such a story has caused the general populous within these prison walls.

The Thais who feel they are the ones most hardest done by, have at least kept their sence of humour.

They now say that they will change their names, nationality, colour of hair, eat the medicine to whiten their skins and also apply for a Royal Pardon.

Any information concerning the possibility of the Thai governments new opinion towards drug offences would greatly be appreciated.
